In my presidential address at The Ohio State University in spring 2014, I spoke of the challenges of researching the complex interaction of national security policy, telecommunications, and the myriad topics that provide the context for the key decisions made by U.S. officials through the 20th century. One question that has frequently come up when I have explained my project to other groups has been “if few scholars have written about this, there is very little existing narrative, and the classification issues are so troublesome, how are you able to find out anything in order to know where to look for more?”

The answer has been that I have relied upon online research tools to a much greater extent than I could have imagined when I first began working on my book Plexus: The United States, International Telecommunications, and National Security, 1920-1945. In this column I want to share how I have managed to use these tools for online research, admit to some ambivalence about the long-term implications of this, and make an appeal for collaborative work from across the Ohio Academy membership to enhance those tools.

One tool in particular I have utilized has been Google Books. I suspect that most of you have dipped into this extensively in the years since Google brought it online. But I have found it particularly helpful given the ambiguities in my project. Quite simply, I would not have found as much as I have in the archives without the information gleaned from repeated searches through the digitized materials found in that database. To be sure, there are a tremendous number of online research tools available now, and most academic libraries subscribe to a great many of them. But increasingly I find that I am using Google Books as my initial search venue when I encounter new names of individuals, committees, or specialized terminology in archival documents or older published works.

An example of how I have done this that I often share with my students is a key discovery I made about something termed “Operation Deep Freeze.” This was a proposed submarine telegraph cable across the North Atlantic that an ITT subsidiary offered to lay for the United States Air Force in the 1950s to meet a significant and specific security concern. For a variety of reasons, the cable would never be laid and the subsidiary would sue the United States government (unsuccessfully) to recoup the survey costs. Because it seemed central to the developing narrative, I poked around in the standard literature in technological and military history to see what might come up. But herein lay a problem: Operation Deep Freeze was also the general name for the U.S. exploration of Antarctica in the same period. The usual scholarly research tools, including JSTOR, gave me everything I did not want about the wrong side of the earth. But when I put “Operation Deep Freeze” into Google Books, I began to get hits on the frozen wonder I was actually interested in, and these hits came from books that had nothing to do with history or even the United States. I soon found myself in legal studies and analyses of British regulatory politics. These in short order led to discussions about NATO communications and technical details involving communications in the Mediterranean and the Near East. In short order I generated a bibliography of books to obtain, source notes to gather, and promising archival leads. These in turn led me to a very different understanding of a heretofore overlooked aspect of the Killian Report, a major Eisenhower administration effort to mitigate vulnerabilities to Soviet surprise attack.

What impressed me in particular was that I was getting this information from deep inside books that I would never, ever have thought to consult, and from parts of the library that I would never have imagined would contain off-hand references to my topic at hand. On the one hand, to be honest, this is not surprising. The scholarly world is full of such interconnections. On the other hand, however, the ability to find and exploit those interconnections, and to get into them well beyond one’s “normal” academic sources, is enormously helpful. It would have been simply impossible to have learned of this information in any meaningful amount of time by wandering the stacks skimming books in possible relevant sections for something as interconnected as this topic. Quite frankly, I used the library better, and armed with the information I found I used the archives better as well.

The second tool, I hesitate to admit, has been Wikipedia. But I’m not using it the way that you would think. Most of us will admit to using the online encyclopedia to resolve discrete inquiries—rushed for time and desirous of the exact date of something for that afternoon’s lecture, and so on—but fewer of us will admit to being regular Wikipedia editors. For several years now I have been editing Wikipedia entries on the individuals, corporations, and concepts relating to the book project. In some instances, I’ve done this to correct errors and anchor them to citations to the relatively obscure published sources that I’m working over. In doing so I’m adhering to one of the core ideas of Wikipedia, which is to make available only that information that can be referenced to published sources. So there are lists of office holders in relatively obscure parts of the federal government in Wikipedia that have been corrected. I also made interconnections between entries to help establish the corporate linkages and evolutions with some of the communications firms in the story. As a result, there is a much more robust set of corporate ownership chronologies for some of the key companies I’m looking at in the project. I’m also crafting short biographies of individuals, particularly scientists, who were remarkable in their own time but whose shine has faded in the march of time.

Why do this, particularly if I wasn’t going to get the credit? In part it was a form of service. The information I’d gathered wasn’t remarkable and didn’t warrant publication on its own—it was simply data gathered from published sources. But the existing entries in Wikipedia were missing that data or listed it incorrectly. If someone was going to make it correct, this was the time to do it. And the information was not, so far as I could tell, available elsewhere. I was the first to aggregate it, and, particularly with the corporations, others could well take the information that I had gleaned from the material and use it to their own advantage later. Why let all of the discoveries I had made vanish into the filing cabinet when the book was over?

The other reason was, I will also admit, a form of laziness. Some of the data I had entered would otherwise have remained buried in files on my computer, organized in folders that would require me to take time to navigate through before I found the detail I needed. By putting it on Wikipedia, I knew that I could load up the entry on a particular FCC Commissioner and get what I myself had put there.

Some of you will point out at this point that what can be added can be subtracted or altered. Certainly, and that is a risk taken with this method. But the things I’m mucking about with are sufficiently obscure, or at least uncontroversial, that it seems to me that there’s a low risk of malicious editing or revision.

And this brings me, then, to my appeal. As you work on your own research projects, I urge you to check what there is in Wikipedia and go so far as to improve it. Indeed, the greater value would come if you were to contribute your knowledge to fill in where there is not a page. Some years ago I was involved with a prize competition that had a person’s name attached to it. No one seemed to know who the person was being honored by the prize. It is said that we all die twice—once when we actually expire, and twice when we are no longer remembered. In a bid to ensure that this individual did not die the second time, I constructed a Wikipedia entry for him sourced to all of the things that I could locate online about him, including a great many things that I could only locate by using Google Books to uncover his past and his impact. The outcome? No one has changed the page since I made it, which is fine, but at least I conferred a little bit of immortality. Moreover, since I was able to put in there my discovery that the individual had been a covert CIA operative (revealed long after his death), someone might find that reference when trying to make sense of archival records from the CIA that they’ve obtained—and another piece of a scholarly puzzle may fall into place. So go forth and preserve what you know, and use all the amazing tools we now have at our disposal for the benefit of those who will follow our lead.

Jonathan Winkler, Ohio Academy of History President
Ohio Academy of History
Executive Council Meeting
4 April 2014

Location: 340 Page Hall, The Ohio State University
In attendance: Bosworth; Brooke; Connell; Douglass; Friedman; Grunden; Hedler; Heiss; Kern; MacLean; Roth; K. Selby; Weaver; Winkler.
Called to order: 12:00 p.m.

Officers’ Reports
President’s Report (Heiss):
- Distributed written report and thanked OSU for hosting the Spring 2014 conference. Also thanked Kelly Selby for chairing the program committee. Emphasized certain points off the written report, specifically: A reminder that Ohio Northern will be hosting the 2015 Spring conference 27–28 March. Ann Heiss will be chair of program committee. Also, the organization still faces challenges with stagnation in certain areas. Heiss recommends reinvigorating the membership committee and the Proceedings to help drive the group forward and maintain academic relevance. Also, hope to finish the revision of the Handbook. Suggested that signs, emails, etc. be given standard templates for consistency and so that they can be passed down to future committee chairs. Finally, creation of a calendar outlining the tasks expected of officers/committee chairs and their respective deadlines was discussed.

Vice President’s Report (Winkler):
- Discussed the highlights of a written report and list of committee assignments:
  Winkler plans to continue the 3-year rotation of committee membership and will expand recruitment efforts to include underrepresented institutions and to target schools from across the state. Along these lines, Winkler hopes to strengthen the program committee and develop a more continuous structure and membership for the committee. Plans are in motion to overhaul and refocus the Professional Development and Outreach Committee to focus more on places where future teachers are being taught. The public history committee will be held in abeyance until the organization gets a better grasp on what our goals should be in that regard and what our relationship should be with public history in the state. This discussion will be resumed at Fall meeting(s). Winkler also outlined three objectives for the presidency. There was discussion and general agreement that, whenever possible, the organization should work to plan Spring conferences as far in advance as possible in order to build the event into a more significant, regional conference.

Past President Report (Wood):
- Wood (absent) submitted a written report regarding the Proceedings and the Membership Committee that was then summarized and elaborated upon by Heiss. Heiss offered to co-chair the Membership Committee with Wood in an effort to handle the group's substantial responsibilities. With the demands on the group, unfortunately some of the duties aren’t effectively addressed. K. Selby volunteered to have a student update the list of historians in Ohio that was last revised in 2009–2010. Douglass suggested splitting off publicity to a separate committee and MacLean reminded the Ex. Council that there was discussion at the Fall 2013 meeting of using targeted brochures to encourage membership and that could be used to help update the list of historians in the state.

Secretary-Treasurer’s Report (Kern):
- Discussed the highlights of a written report, namely:
  The Jr. Faculty Research fund is currently in a 15-month CD with .25% interest as opposed to the 13-month .10% CD it was in previously. Pre-registration for the Spring Conference came to 72. This was significantly higher than last year's pre-registration numbers and this was likely due to the successful roll out of the online registration option through the OAH/OHS website. The committee thanked Betsy Hedler for her work making sure the online registration ran smoothly. At Winkler's request, Kern indicated that the most substantial recurring cost for the organization is the expenses for awards (Distinguished Historian, Dissertation, plaques, etc.). These typically come to $1500+ and come before the costs related to organizing and running the Spring Conference. Douglass broached the possibility of investing in treasuries to get a better return and while this is certainly a possibility (and up to the Ex. Council to decide), Kern expressed his concern that the organization maintain some liquidity. It was pointed out that the Academy's checking account may suffice to serve this need.

Archivist’s Report (MacLean):
- Discussed the contents of a written report, namely:
  The Handbook is now ¾ complete and MacLean thanked everyone for their feedback and suggestions for revisions. She is currently rearranging the introduction and also solicited help from committee chairs in finishing that section to which K. Selby indicated that she would pass along her suggestions for the Handbook. When Section 4 is finished in the next few weeks, MacLean will run it by the President and other officers for finishing touches. The OHS seems to be thriving and is more engaged/active in growing historical interest in the state. It is working with much better finances. Statehood Day is going very well and this was significantly higher than last year's pre-registration numbers and this was likely due to the successful roll out of the online registration option through the OAH/OHS website. The committee thanked Betsy Hedler for her work making sure the online registration ran smoothly. At Winkler's request, Kern indicated that the most substantial recurring cost for the organization is the expenses for awards (Distinguished Historian, Dissertation, plaques, etc.). These typically come to $1500+ and come before the costs related to organizing and running the Spring Conference. Douglass broached the possibility of investing in treasuries to get a better return and while this is certainly a possibility (and up to the Ex. Council to decide), Kern expressed his concern that the organization maintain some liquidity. It was pointed out that the Academy's checking account may suffice to serve this need.

Updates from Ohio Historical Society (Hedler):
- The Ohio Historical Society is in the process of rebranding and will in the future (from May 24, 2014) be known as the Ohio History Connection. Also, Megan Wood, former Ohio Historical Society Liaison to the Ohio Academy of History, has accepted a position as Associate Vice President, Education & Visitor Experience of the Historic Ford Estates in Michigan.

Award Committee Report:
- Ex. Council unanimously approved via email the editor's pre-circulated report without debate.

Award Committee Reports

Distinguished Historian (Heiss):
- Written report circulated in advance. Also, discussed need for a more robust competition next year for this and all awards.

Dissertation Award (Douglass):
- Written report circulated in advance. Out of three nominees Steve L. Haynes from Kent State University was selected as the recipient. Suggested including an announcement about the award in the Newsletter as a way to solicit nominations and perhaps increasing the number of submissions allowed per institution (there are only six doctoral programs left in the state and of those, University of Toledó’s is "on life support.") The possibility was raised of expanding to include an award for a superior MA thesis but this should be in addition to the dissertation award and not in lieu of.

Public History Award (Weininger):
- Written report circulated in advance. Christie Weininger was the only nominee but was very worthy of the award. Betsy Hedler reassured the EX. Council that the award was publicized via the Ohio Public History community.

Publication Award (Harp):
- Report circulated in advance. There were seven submissions for the award. Alice Conklin won the award for a work by a senior scholar while Daniel Rivers won the junior scholar award. A review of the number of nominees over the past 30 years indicated in increase in that when the Academy included synopses of nominees in the newsletter, there tended to be more nominees for the award. In recent years, these synopses have been left out and the number of nominees has declined. MacLean suggested adding synopses back into the Newsletter.

Distinguished Service Award (Weaver):
- Written report distributed and approved without objection.

Teaching Award (Roth):
- Greg Anderson was the winner out of four nominees. There were no nominees from small, liberal arts colleges; however, nominees are kept in the pool for three years. Discussion: nominees and winners should be successful at teaching general education and survey courses in addition to more specialized classes.

Public History Award Committee (Weininger):
- Written report circulated in advance. Christie Weininger was the only nominee but was very worthy of the award. Betsy Hedler reassured the EX. Council that the award was publicized via the Ohio Public History community.

Nominating Committee (Hale):
- Ex. Council unanimously approved the nominating committee's pre-circulated report without debate.

Public History (Award) Committe (Weininger):
- Ex. Council unanimously approved the committee's pre-circulated report without debate.

Professional Development K-12 (Connell):
- Since the annual meeting is really the only professional development the Academy does, Connell agrees with Winkler’s idea to suspend the operation of the committee pending further consideration.

New Business

Academy Prizes:
- Main concern is increasing number of nominees. Also, committee must confirm eligibility (may contact Hedler) to ensure nominees, where required, are members of the Academy.

Academy Historian:
- Ex. Council discussion: splitting the duties of Archivist and Historian and finding a Historian who will attend OHS meetings and write a history of the Academy. Conversation tabled again.

Academy Roster:
- The membership committee will take care of updating this.

Extending Ex Council Term of Past Presidents:
- Heiss and Connell mentioned that extending this term to two years would improve continuity.

Academy Website:
- Website needs updated; Heiss requested (Hedler agreed it's feasible) the website host an online option for contributing to the endowment fund. All reports were approved unanimously by the EX. Council or were deemed approved without objection by the President unless otherwise noted.

Meeting adjourned: 2:55.

The Ohio Academy of History seeks papers in all fields of history for the Spring 2015 Annual Meeting and Conference to be held at Ohio Northern University in Ada, Ohio. We strongly encourage the submission of full panel sessions, with papers, comment, and chair, addressing any historical topic, area, or time period. Panels on world history or non-western history are especially appreciated. Proposals focusing on historiography, methodology, pedagogy, and public history are also encouraged. Individual papers may be proposed, but they are less likely to be accepted on their own due to the difficulty of combining them with others to form a panel with a coherent theme. In addition to traditional format sessions (scholarly papers with chair and commenter), the Ohio Academy welcomes non-traditional formats such as roundtables, discussion panels, or teaching-focused formats. We do not at this time solicit or accept undergraduate papers.

Submit proposals to the chair of the Program Committee, Mary Ann Heiss mheiss@kent.edu, by November 1, 2014.

Proposals must include:
- a paper title and 150-word abstract (and in the case of a complete panel, a 250-word description of the panel theme)
- a one-page biography, resume, or curriculum vita
- complete contact information (telephone/cell number and email/postal address)

Presenters must register for the conference by March 1, 2015 to be included in the program.
